The Miracle Girl is a story largely about faith and belief. How did your own faith and belief affect how you read the novel? Some readers have said they believed the miracles described in the book were real; some have said they didn't think they were real; and others have said it didn't matter to them either way. Did you feel like you had to ...

Well well well. The Miracle Girl has an interesting concept, but gosh darn is it hard to finish. That's probably why I didn't. The Miracle Girl by Andrew Roe is one of those multi POV books that have a whole cast of characters comment or connect to one thing. In this book, a cast of characters all have one thing in common: a girl named Anabelle ...

The Miracle Girl takes place in the latter half of 1999, as the millennium approaches, amid the buzz and chatter of Y2K, computer crashes, and the end of the world. How does having the book set in this time period reflect its themes? After the car accident, John leaves his family and embarks on a period of exile, wanting "to become a monk, and if not that, then at least be able to classify ...
