Anatomy of a Saxophone Even though it is mainly made of brass, the saxophone is not to be confused with brass instruments (which have no reed, such as the trumpet). Its sound is produced by blowing into a mouthpiece and making a reed vibrate against this same mouthpiece. The bigger the body, the lower the sound

The Beginners Guide to the Saxophone. December 5, 2019 December 5, 2019 by Jordan Foster. The saxophone has been through a bit of a roller coaster ride in the realm of popular music. Ever since the technological explosion of recorded music, it has made its mark on a variety of musical genres. The heyday of the sax is quite potentially the 50's and 60's period. During this era, the ...

The alto saxophone—tuned to Eb, two-and-a-half steps higher than the tenor saxophone—is far and away the most common starter instrument in the saxophone family. Its more compact key layout and need for a little less air make it a solid choice for the younger student. In elementary and high schools, altos typically represent the largest share of the saxophone section.

With the sax, only the fingers move (and hands a little bit) so rather than fingers going to the notes, the notes have to come to the fingers. This is why there are so many rods, hinges and little wig-wags all over the body of the saxophone – they extend the fingers to places that the fingers can't reach. 2. If all the rods, hinges and wig-wags were put on the inside (like a piano) they ...
